Imi Knoebel is one of the most significant representatives of Minimal Art in Germany. As a student of Joseph Beuys, he developed an independent artistic stance at an early stage, one that consistently engages with the fundamental questions of colour, surface and material, thereby combining minimalism with a surprisingly sensual quality.

This work captivates with its radical simplicity: two monochrome surfaces in white and black face each other. Yet it is precisely in this reduction that the work's particular tension unfolds. The white painted surface on aluminium meets a black-painted plastic film; two different supports whose materiality remains deliberately visible and decisively shapes perception.

Typical of Knoebel is his handling of surface and application. Despite the apparent austerity, the brushstroke remains present, fine, rhythmic, almost meditative. The surfaces are not smooth and industrial, but bear a subtle, artisanal signature. This is precisely where the appeal lies: the work moves between perfect geometry and vibrant painting.

Knoebel thus develops central ideas of Minimal Art, yet liberates them from their often cool austerity. His works are not anonymous objects, but possess a quiet, intense presence. The reduction to black and white thus becomes a concentrated experience of material, light and surface.
