- Work executed in Dufy's characteristic style
- Depicts the Chapelle Notre-Dame des Flots in Sainte-Adresse
- The lightness of maritime life

The port of Le Havre in north-western France is not only the second-largest port in the country and (formerly) an important defensive stronghold against invading English forces. Today, the port is one of Europe's most important cargo ports and of critical importance as a transshipment hub. On the 10,000-hectare site, supertankers are unloaded with oil, and cruise ships and yachts are handled.

None of this is visible in Raoul Dufy's painting. Quite the contrary: the artist shows us a romanticised version of the harbour bay; small waves carry a solitary sailing ship. Le Havre is condensed into a miniature-like town, with only a single tower peeking out. In the foreground, Dufy depicts the Chapelle Notre-Dame des Flots. Built in 1857 in the neighbouring Sainte-Adresse, the church overlooks the entire bay. It is dedicated to Our Lady and serves the faithful as a seafarers' church, where prayers are offered for a safe voyage and those lost at sea are remembered.
